NASA’s new rocket would be the most powerful ever. But it’s the software that has some officials worried.

Technology

Technology is present in practically any part of our life, so you should always be aware of the latest news. Technology is an area in which new advances and discoveries are made every day, don't miss the latest news, we take care of keeping you informed about it. Find out with us about all the new discoveries of this wonderful world

NASA’s newest moon rocket is powered not only by four RS-25 engines that, combined, unleash 2 million pounds of thrust, but by two solid fuel side boosters that burn six tons of propellant a second at such enormous temperatures that during a recent test fire in the Utah desert, the flames turned sand to glass.

When it launches, NASA’s Space Launch System rocket, a towering 322-foot behemoth — taller than the Statue of Liberty — would be the most powerful rocket ever flown, eclipsing both the Saturn V that flew astronauts to the moon and SpaceX’s Falcon Heavy, which has launched commercial and national security satellites as well as founder Elon Musk’s Tesla Roadster on a trip to Mars.

But as NASA moves toward the SLS’s first flight, putting the Orion spacecraft in orbit around the moon, it’s not the rocket’s engines that concern officials but the software that will control everything the rocket does, from setting its trajectory to opening individual valves to open and close.

Computing power has become as critical to rockets as the brute force that lifts them out of Earth’s atmosphere, especially rockets like the SLS, which is really an amalgamation of parts built by a variety of manufacturers

Also troubling to the safety panel was that NASA and its contractors appeared not to have taken “advantage of the lessons learned” from the botched flight last year of Boeing’s Starliner spacecraft, which suffered a pair of software errors that prevented it from docking with the International Space Station as planned and forced controllers to cut the mission short.

NASA has since said that it did a poor job of overseeing Boeing on the Starliner program and has since vowed to have more rigorous reviews of its work, especially its software testing.

The SLS software concerns are the latest red flags for a program that has struggled to overcome cost overruns and setbacks. A slew of government watchdog reports over the years have painted a troubling picture of mismanagement.

Opinión:

The software has taken great importance in our lives and even more when people's lives depend on it, I believe that the most rigorous quality standards should be followed to ensure that no failure occurs since if so, people could suffer serious consequences. Quality standards must be improved and authorities must act precisely to ensure that these protocols are met.

Technological advances are more amazing every public — a first just in time for the pandemic

Escrito por Mirjam Nilsson

Waymo is launching fully driverless vehicles to the public, a milestone achievement for Silicon Valley's self-driving car industry that comes during a global pandemic in which efforts to limit person-to-person contact have found a welcoming audience.

The company, a part of Google parent Alphabet, said Thursday it is opening up its driverless ride-hailing service to riders in the Phoenix metro area, enabling the front seat. It follows an extended public trial for the company's ride-hailing service in which riders were able to use it for commutes, grocery runs and routine tasks, such as bringing their kids to school. During that launch period, Waymo said, it gradually expanded its service and the capabilities of its vehicles — the vast majority of which were monitored by human drivers. Waymo spokeswoman Katherine Barna said the company was giving between 1,000 and 2,000 weekly rides before the coronavirus pandemic, 5 to 10 companies have delayed their rollouts and extended their timelines, confronted by the challenge of programming cars to respond to the near-infinite stream of scenarios a driver could face. The pandemic threw a further wrench into the companies' plans.

Waymo has long been seen as the industry leader in the space, trailed by competitors such as ride-hailing services Uber and Lyft, Amazon-acquired Zoox, General Motors' Cruise and automakers pursuing autonomy, such as Tesla.

day and autonomous cars are becoming a reality, without a doubt they are a great technological advance but as in everything, with great power, comes great responsibility (Uncle ben). Before they are released to the public, they must undergo rigorous tests to ensure that they will not put people at risk and that they will respond appropriately to the adversities of the cities.

BUSINESS In this section we show you all the news of what is happening in the business world. Find out what happens every day in the economy of our country and the rest of the world.

In CDMX will reach 35 thousand businesses closed in 2020: Capital Coparmex

The president of Coparmex CDMX, Armando Zúñiga, commented that the situation that businesses are living is difficult because "the constant risk of returning to red traffic lights, which, as has already been pointed out, would put most of the companies in the capital at risk of death".

The economic crisis facing it will cause the country's capital to end 2020 with approximately 35,000 closed businesses and more than

200,000 jobs lost, said the president of the Confederation of Employers of the Mexican Republic of Mexico City (Coparmex-CDMX), Armando Zúñiga

But if you go back to the red light because of the health crisis because of the Covid-19 pandemic, the situation will be even worse because death would put more companies in that situation.

At a press conference, as part of the Coparmex tour in your state that now took place in Mexico City, Zúñiga said that if 35,000 economic units were closed, at least 200,000 jobs would be lost, but you have to consider that they can actually be more because many businesses are micro or small that do not contribute to Social Security.

For what Zúñiga proposed to the capital government proposals to reactivate the economy and employment among which are: temporary exemption from payroll tax; tax incentives of between 50% and 100% deferral of the payment of Property Tax to companies that have maintained the work plant; and a solidarity insurance that supports workers to maintain a minimum living wage.

"The government does not want businesses to stop paying taxes and go into the informal sector, or to be in the dilemma of paying taxes or salaries," Zúñiga said.

For his part, the candidate of unity to the National Coparmex, José Medina Mora, said they insist on the government to grant

OPINION

In my opinion, it is of the utmost importance to remain attentive to the statistics and data that are presented on a daily basis on health issues and especially on the Covid-19 virus.

OPINION

In my opinion, the closing of the Best Buy store will have an impact mainly on technology buyers in general. Best Buy is a good option to purchase technology items at prices very similar to those offered by companies. On the other hand, we can again large compresses like this have been affected by the pandemic generated by the Covid-19 virus.

Harry Styles, the first man to occupy the cover of 'Vogue USA' alone

As it reads in the title, we will talk about what the famous singer's experience with vogue was like and besides that it marked a very important impact on fashion.

The next issue of Vogue USA, that of December, has advanced its cover and, to the surprise of many, it is Harry Styles who is on it. The issue, which will hit newsstands in a few days, has put the singer in his first and, for this reason, it becomes a historic one of those who have devised the header. There have been nine men who have occupied the cover of the magazine although none has done it alone.

After Richard Gere, George Clooney, Ben Affleck or Justin Bieber - accompanied by Cindy Crawford, Gisele Bundchen, Penelope Cruz or Hailey Bieber - among others, Harry Styles becomes the tenth man to be on the cover of the American edition of Vogue. A milestone that serves for the singer and many people close to his figure to speak in an extensive (very extensive) interview that Hamish Bowles leads about the path he has followed to become the world star that he is today.

Throughout various encounters that begin during the month of September in London, Harry Styles opens up frankly to the editor of Vogue USA. The singer tells what he is reading at the time, his new love for meditation or how he has undergone a juice treatment in preparation for the photo session that Tyler Mitchell will shoot for the cover and inside pages. That and no other is the true heart of the report in which the artist is the protagonist and one more reason to consider the singer as one of the most relevant style icons of recent times. Harry Lambert, his stylist for seven years and responsible, in part, that Harry has become one of the favorites in the world of fashion, also has an exceptional place in the report.

Pieces such as a dress with a train and ruffles designed by Alessandro Michele –his friend for years and collaborator in the preparation of outfits for moments as important as the photograph of the cover of his latest album, Fine Line–, spectacular kilts by Comme des Garçons Homme Plus or JW Anderson (another of the designers closest to the singer and thanks to whom he starred in a fun challenge on TikTok), and unstructured coats from Maison Martin Margiela are some of those that can be seen throughout the pages of a production in which he already Harry Styles' star quality is taken for granted.

Along the lines of the interview there is room to introduce his sister, Gemma Styles, a designer of glasses who appears next to the protagonist in a portrait and also to talk in depth about the projects that Harry Styles has signed after confinement as For example, taking part in Don't Worry Darling, a thriller directed by Olivia Wilde and in which she shares shots with actress Florence Pugh.

in addition to also having participated in Dunkerque produced by Christopher Nolan

U.S. agrees to drop charges against former Mexican defense minister

Weeks after arresting Mexico's former defense minister on drug trafficking charges, the United States has agreed to return Gen. Salvador Cienfuegos Zepeda to Mexico, a retreat from incendiary charges that sent a shock through U.S.-Mexico relations.

The extraordinary decision to release Cienfuegos after a long-term, top-secret U.S. investigation allegedly revealed his ties to Mexico's criminal underworld is an unexpected twist in one of the highest-profile drug-trafficking cases in recent decades. U.S. Justice Department officials depicted Cienfuegos's arrest as a window into dramatic institutional corruption in Mexico. Mexican officials have not committed to trying him upon his return.

The decision is sure to be greeted as a triumph in Mexico, where the government considered Cienfuegos's arrest a violation of sovereignty. But it raises questions about the trade-off between U.S. investigations into Mexican drug trafficking and attempts to maintain a delicate bilateral relationship.

"In recognition of the strong law enforcement partnership between Mexico and the United States, and in the interests of demonstrating our united front against all forms of criminality, the United States Department of Justice has made the decision to seek dismissal of the U.S. criminal charges against former Secretary Cienfuegos, so that he may be investigated and, if appropriate, charged, under

Mexican law," Attorney General William P. Barr and Alejandro Gertz Manero, his Mexican counterpart, said in a news release.

The decision appeared to be an attempt to repair a growing breach in relations over Cienfuegos's arrest. Mexican President Andrés Manuel López Obrador suggested the arrest might have been made "for political or other reasons" and accused the Drug Enforcement Administration of "meddling."

Mexican Foreign Minister Marcelo Ebrard told a news conference Tuesday that he had spoken with Barr twice in recent weeks to express Mexico's "surprise and unhappiness" that it wasn't notified in advance of the investigation. Ebrard said the deal to investigate Cienfuegos in Mexico did not imply impunity but "respect for Mexico and its armed forces." He said cooperation on drugs "will be maintained" but added "that can only exist if there is respect for Mexico's sovereignty."

For decades, the United States relied on extradition to try Mexican drug traffickers in U.S. courtrooms, believing that they would never be held to justice in Mexico. Then last year the Justice Department arrested Genaro García Luna,

"The government does not want businesses to stop paying taxes and go into the informal sector, or to be in the dilemma of paying taxes or salaries," Zúñiga said.

Both indictments were brought by prosecutors in the Eastern District of New York. But U.S. investigators did not inform the Mexican government of the cases until after the arrests, leading to mistrust. Some current and former U.S. officials believed that Cienfuegos's arrest in particular might not have been worth upsetting the delicate but important relationship between the countries.

It's not clear that Mexico has done much to probe possible ties between Cienfuegos and drug traffickers. On Oct. 21, López Obrador indicated growing concern in Mexico about the Cienfuegos case. "Show us those operations of complicity if they have the proof," he said. He said Mexico would open its own investigation only

Protests turn to celebrations as Peru’s interim president offers resignation

Facing furious nationwide protests and growing international pressure, interim President Manuel Merino resigned on Sunday, less than a week after he was inaugurated to replace ousted popular president Martín Vizcarra.

The resignation set Peruvians up for their fifth president in five years, as the South American nation faced its worst constitutional crisis since the fall of Alberto Fujimori’s tainted presidency two decades ago.

For millions of Peruvians, particularly the young, Merino had become the face of a corrupt political class that has entrenched itself in Congress and sought to stop Vizcarra’s attempts to end their careers through sweeping changes. The mass protests that forced Merino to step down were less about defending Vizcarra than expressing public outrage at the political forces that had removed him.

In a brief televised speech, Merino said his de facto cabinet would continue while Congress worked to name a new president. But it was unclear who he was talking about; at least 11 ministers, including the heads of the ministries of interior, justice, trade, and energy and mines, announced their resignations, some on Twitter, overnight.

Peru has been in turmoil since the scandal-racked Congress removed Vizcarra on Nov. 9 over unproven claims that he accepted bribes when he was a regional governor. Vizcarra is widely seen here as a reformer; he has denied wrongdoing and has said consistently that he will cooperate fully with prosecutors. On Saturday, a judge ordered him not to leave the country.

Two demonstrators were killed and scores were injured Saturday night as officers in riot gear used tear gas and other means to attempt to quell largely peaceful protests in Lima, the capital, and other cities across the Andean nation

The political chaos has unfolded as Peru struggles against one of the world’s most lethal coronavirus outbreaks. The country has reported more than 934,000 cases and 35,000 deaths from covid-19

Like his cabinet, made up largely of aging far-right politicians, Merino had appeared incapable of comprehending the fury of the protesters — many of them millennials or younger in a country where the median age is just 31 — or their chant of “They messed with the wrong generation.”

What is happening in Peru is a shame, people are not coming out to protest to defend Vizcarra, they are coming out to protest because what the Congress has been doing is totally undemocratic. The elections in Peru are scheduled for April of next year but the interests of the members of Congress made them make these kinds of decisions that go against everything that democracy represents.

All offers will be valid until November 30 and will begin to be activated on November 26, but until then and from now on we will be able to access some advance

Specializing in quality basics, the Japanese firm Uniqlo has been investing for some time in its different lines of thermal and warm fabrics for the winter months. This is the case of Heatttech's own technology or its commitment to highly concentrated feather or cashmere garments. Now that it's time to spend more time outside and the temperatures drop, in EL PAÍS Escaparate we have selected seven garment proposals, made with high-quality fabrics, which favor heat retention and that adapt to men's, women's and children's wardrobes. We are also facing a great opportunity to get hold of them because they can be purchased discounted for Black Friday.

discounts in all categories of garments. These are coats, jackets, leggings, fleeces, sweaters, hats or scarves that have been made to ensure an optimal thermal state and at the same time guarantee greater comfort. In addition to the special discounts for Black Friday, Uniqlo continues to offer the usual 10 euros discount on the first purchase made through the online store.

OPINION

It is important to be aware of fashionable things always be an interesting topic for you

FLEECES
Along with down jackets and down jackets, fleeces are another must-have for winter. In this sense, within its general proposal, the Japanese firm includes these polar jackets that improve the classic lining using long hair threads. The result is an even softer and softer garment. The jacket of the men's line is also made with 30% recycled polyester created from plastic bottles, a sustainable strategy that Uniqlo develops to make several of its garments.

Alessandro Michele: "The world and fashion have changed and will never be the same again"

Alessandro Michele, Gucci's creative director, announced six months ago that he would reduce the number of collections of the Italian brand and that these would not respond to the traditional division by seasons and gender. He was not the only one who, after the first confinement, claimed a change in the fast-paced fashion industry.

Giorgio Armani, Dries Van Noten or Isabel Marant then warned about the need to slow down the production and distribution rates to ensure the sustainability of the sector, in all senses. But while most are still struggling against the inertia of the system, the 47-year-old Roman designer is the only one who has taken a new and parallel path, just as he promised. "When I advanced this transformation, it was not to achieve media coverage, I really believe that the world and fashion have changed and will never be the same again. What was once safe is no longer safe. And not seeing it is dangerous ", he assures by video call.

His latest collection, Ouverture of Something that Never Ended, was presented last week, a month and a half after the end of Milan Fashion Week, where until now the brand had always walked. And he did so through a seven-episode miniseries co-directed by Michele and filmmaker Gus Van Sant, author of Elephant or My Private Idaho, the designer's favorite. The fiction recreates a surreal universe in which the Italian actress Silvia Calderoni runs into and interacts with characters such as the singers Billie Eilish or Harry Styles; Spanish queer activist Paul B. Preciado or art historian Achille Bonito Oliva.
